The war felt much more intense on the ground. Some at the heart of the UN operation in the north of the country - particularly those who were employed by the BBC - could sense, almost on an instinctive level, that something extraordinary was happening. The only question was what. In the south, where the main conflict took place, UN forces felt a further wrenching mix of fear, apprehension and uncertainty. It was a well-established fact that UN troops had been unable to halt the advance of Iraqi regulars down from Syria. But anyone who had served in the Gulf before the war, in 1982 or 1991, could guess that the north, with its thick, mountainous terrain and vulnerability to air strikes, was probably the most dangerous sector. The key question of the day, however, was the extent of the Iraqi ground attack on Israel. US military commanders had long predicted that if
