Electronic publication in solid state drives Electronic publication in solid state drives or eSDD is a specialty variant of eSDD that is used primarily in the optical storage media business. The head passes over a track of the medium, while a sled reads the track. At 7 cm/s (2.7 in/s) the sled is 25% faster than conventional drives and can process 14 gigabytes (GB) (252 megabytes, MB) of data per second. The sled moves at 0.6 cm/s (3.5 in/s). The major advantage of eSDD is the ability to store data on high-density media. The current price of eSDD is about one-fifth that of the same capacity 5.25-inch hard disk drive. If a five-inch or three-inch floppy disk is replaced by a two-inch eSDD, the drive is 12 times faster, uses 25% less power, and is capable of 50% more storage. It is also less than half the size of a regular floppy disk drive and weighs less than 10% of a conventional drive. An eSDD in the same size as a floppy disk is capable of holding 1,000 times the amount of data. In the late 1990s, eSDD was widely anticipated to replace the CD-ROM and floppy disk drives in computers, with the possibility of replacing today's optical disks. However, the market has not been as supportive of eSDD as expected. I'm getting this warning in the C# XAML designer: The event is already part of the body of the method; it cannot be duplicated. I can't find a rationale for the warning or a fix. I'm using Visual Studio 2010 Pro SP1 and ReSharper 4.5. A: A search in the Jetbrains.ReSharper community forum for "Redundant event" yields this: We just fixed this one for 4.5 but now I can't reproduce it. A fix was submitted: This warning will be removed in version 5. You can tell it by the d0c515b9f4
