Perhaps, in a dream, I saw him with another, dead in the morning, and saw, with horror, that I had been the cause of it." "But the man was saved--why should you be punished?" asked Ella. "I know not what may be the end. I cannot save myself. No one else is in fault but myself. I cannot bear this thought. I shall think of it no more, and of nothing else. I shall begin a new life, and ask God to let me forget the past." "Can I help you?" asked Ella, anxiously. "I will pray for you." "No," said Ella, with a shudder; "I do not want any help, nor would I ask for it. What I must do I can do alone." Ella rose and went to the stone-window, to which she looked earnestly for a few moments before replying to the priest, as if trying to calculate what was her best course in the midst of the complexity of her feelings. At length, she turned round with the proud, resolute face of a woman whose whole future lay in her own hand, and said to the priest, "I will go with you, Father."

"Thank you, my daughter." There was a confused murmur in the room; all hastened, with some awkwardly subdued emotion, to see the two who had been thrown asunder again, and who now, with silent yet confident faces, stood before each other. Two persons, one in supreme distress, the other with a firm resolute look, went away together; the one weeping, and wringing her
