China's president Xi Jinping pledged "no winners, no losers" in an address to mark the 70th anniversary of the founding of Communist China at a colourful parade in Beijing on Thursday, but the reality is that the United States has already won, and China has very little to gain from getting involved in a trade war. China is the second largest trading partner of the US. The US, by contrast, is China's biggest trading partner. During 2018 China's exports to the US were $540 billion, while US exports to China were $566 billion. Beijing is in the driver's seat on deciding the rules of the economic game. But it's also clear that the US has the wind in its sails. Beijing has already brought back over $100 billion in tariffs on US imports, and it's threatening more. The trade war with the US is a battle between two different economic systems; one requires businesses to sacrifice long-term profits for the sake of short-term losses. It's about short-term profitability versus a long-term, sustainable economic system that allows businesses to survive. The answer to the trade war does not lie in the arcane world of international trade law, but rather in American workers, who have been lobbying for decades to raise living standards in the US. This isn't just about raising wages. It's also about re-balancing some of the excess labour in the US, which has contributed to economic inequality. "A trade war hurts the US workers the most. Workers come to the US for higher-paying jobs," said Dan Ikenson, director of the Center for Trade Policy Studies at the Cato Institute. So far, we've seen some of the trade-war knock-on effects. US soybeans, which are mainly used in making feed for livestock and poultry, have traded at an average 25% premium over the Canadian and Brazilian versions
